I took Garnetts Lady Fox novel out of my pocket, put it in front of Franz and told him; Garnett copied your Metamorphosis literary device. Most authors use symbolism to relate the theme of their work, not Franz Kafka. In Metamorphosis (Die Verwandlung), Kafka uses a literary device that focuses the readers attention on a single character that symbolizes himself and his life. The simple, but metaphorically multilayered, story depicts multiple similarities between Kafkas real life and Gregor Samsa, the leading character. This is revealed by several of his diary entries and especially by a letter Kafka wrote to Max Brod in October 1912, which caused Brod to intervene with Kafkas mother. Besides his work in the insurance office, which was hateful enough, Kafka also had to take on additional duties in the factory belonging to his father and brother-in-law and all his free writing time was gone, just at a time when The Trial had made a breakthrough into his mature literary style and needed all his attention. Clyve Parkers Translation Born in South Africa and currently living in Prague, Clyve Parker, a philologist and a student of the German language, had fascinating dialogs, revolving around Kafka and his work, with a younger...
